7 In addition, the present research also found evidence of "over control" strategies among parents. Specifically, "in my home, I try to control as much as I can." Parents who used this strategy were found to be less involved with their children, less responsive, and less involved with their children. The implications of this finding are that parents who use this strategy may be less effective in their parenting role. This finding is consistent with previous research on parenting styles and parenting effectiveness (Hinde, 1985; Hinde & Stevenson-Hinde, 1982).
