

ABSTRACT

Background: There are very a few studies on psychiatric symptoms in patients with Diabetes Mellitus (DM) patients and assessing glycemic control.

Aim: To describe the level of glycemic control, complications and psychosocial functioning among DM patients using the Depression Anxiety Stress Scales (DASS-21) instrument and its predictors among diabetic Turkish population.

Subject and Methods: A cross-sectional study conducted from February 2016 to January 2017. Of the total 1,800 diabetic patients approached, 1,147 (71.8%) gave their consent. Data analysis included, sociodemographic, blood pressure and glycosylated hemoglobin (HbA1c) and the Depression Anxiety Stress Scales (DASS-21) and Beck Depression Inventory (BDI-II) scale to assess the validity of DASS-21.

Results: Most of the studied diabetic cases were with HbA1c  $\geq 8$  glycemic in the age group above 60 years old. There were statistically significant differences between two groups regarding education ( $p = 0.028$ ), income ( $p = 0.007$ ), place of residence ( $p = 0.014$ ) and consequently marriage ( $p = 0.026$ ). The most significant difference were observed for parameters such as family history of Diabetes Mellitus, physical activities, high blood pressure, stroke and major vascular complications. The depression, anxiety and stress scores were significantly higher and more frequent in diabetic HbA1c  $\geq 8$  cases compared to HbA1c  $< 8$ . The multivariable logistic regression analysis revealed that high blood pressure, BDI-II depression, DASS-21 stress, physical activities, DASS-21 depression, income, family history of diabetes, DASS-21 anxiety and sleeping disturbance were the major significant contributors after adjusting for age, gender and other variables. The distribution depression, anxiety and stress scores in DM patients were higher in HbA1c  $\geq 8$  compared to HbA1c  $< 8$ .

Conclusions: The current study suggests that there is relationship between DM and depression, anxiety and stress symptoms in Turkish population. DM is very complex disease and its management requires significant self-control and increasing access to psychological support.

INTRODUCTION

Diabetes Mellitus and psychiatric symptoms are two a major global public health problems which is increasing dramatically in developed and developing countries [1,2]. Several factors contribute to DM pathogenesis, including psychological [3], environmental and lifestyle factors [4,5], positive family history [6], ethnicity [7], and genetics [8-9]. Some authors reported that the prevalence of DM rising substantially because of the epidemic of sedentary lifestyle and obesity [3,4].

There is a well recognized association between diabetes, depression, anxiety and stress and evidence showed that chronic diseases usually have associated unmet/unrecognized mental health disorders [2]. Although depression, anxiety, tension and stress are most commonly undiagnosed or underdiagnosed among DM patients [9]. Several authors have reported that patients with diabetes are at least twice at risk to suffer from depression, anxiety and stress compared to the general population [8,8,10,11]. Furthermore, such symptoms mostly are associated with poor glycemic control, diabetes complications, worsened prognosis and quality-of-life [8,9,12]. Moreover, health care utilization and costs [13] increase with the occurrence of diabetes and major depression. Diabetes depression and stress has been found to be significantly associated with glycosylated hemoglobin (HbA1c) level [14].

The objective of the present study is to investigate the prevalence of anxiety, depression and stress symptoms among DM patients using the Depression Anxiety Stress Scales (DASS-21) instrument and its predictors among in Turkish population.

SUBJECTS AND METHODS

The design based on a cross-sectional study which was performed among the diabetic patients registered in diabetic clinics of the hospitals during the study period from February 2016 to January 2017. IRB ethical approval for this study was obtained from the Correspondence Faculty of Medicine and Biomedicine International School of Medicine, Istanbul Medipol University.

Subjects currently taking oral medications for diabetes 3 years considered to have DM and diagnosed in accordance with international standards (WHO 2006). HbA1c level measured using the DCA Vantage Analyzer (Chemtec Healthcare Diagnostics Inc, USA) from the same single finger prick.

A total number of 1,800 of DM patients males and females aged above 20 years approached and they were selected systematically 1 in 2 using a systematic sampling procedure of the PRG system and 1,147 cases agreed to participate in the study with a response rate of 71.8%. 439 of them were excluded either because of incomplete questionnaires (145 diabetic) or did not want to respond to questionnaire (190 diabetic) due to lack of time resulting in 1,147 subjects (71.8%) for final analysis.

Depression Anxiety Stress Scales (DASS-21) questionnaire is very well known [15-18] tool consists of 21 symptoms divided into 3 subscales: depression, anxiety, and stress; of each 7 items and has excellent reliability estimates (15-18). DASS-21 symptoms based on 4-point severity scale ranging from 0 to 3 (normal and severe were categorized into normal, mild/moderate and severe) [8,15,19,20], with the scale depressive (0-9, 10-20, and >20), anxiety (0-7, 8-14, and >14), and stress (0-14, 15-25, and >25).

Furthermore, we have used the questionnaire based on the DSM-IV Depression Scale to assess the validity of DASS-21 screening scale as reported and confirmed by the previous studies [8,19,20]. The instrument consists of 15 items/statements that are self-reported. The score ranges from 0 to 45 to determine possible degree of depression symptoms. The instrument developers established four groups of scores and classified as the following "minimal 0-15, mild 16-19, moderate 20-26, and severe 27-45" [18] and cut-off scores for DSM-IV of 16 to indicate clinical depression [19,20].
