Kracaw,1993 With the recent failings of a variety of financial institutions and the weaknesses of certain financial instruments there is now a growing demand for graduates with a sophisticated understanding of risk management This text is designed to fill this niche Arbitrage Chains James Dow,Gary Gorton,1993 In efficient markets the price should reflect the arrival of private information The mechanism by which this is accomplished is arbitrage A privately informed trader will engage in costly arbitrage that is trade on his knowledge that the price of an asset is different from the fundamental value if 1 his order does not move the price immediately to reflect the information 2 he can hold the asset until the date when the information is reflected in the price We study a general equilibrium model in which all agents optimize In each period there may be a trader with a limited horizon who has private information about a distant event Whether he acts on his information and whether subsequent informed traders act is shown to depend on the possibility of a sequence or chain of future informed traders spanning the event date An arbitrageur who receives good news will buy only if it is likely that at the end of his trading horizon a subsequent arbitrageur s buying will have pushed up the expected price We show that limited trading horizons result in inefficient prices because informed traders do not act on their information until the event date is sufficiently close Kentucky Agricultural Statistics ,2006 Pricing of Liquidity for Preferred Stocks on the New York Stock Exchange Frank K. Moore,2005 This paper addresses currency competition from an information perspective Transactions in traditional models do not convey information so transaction costs the driver of competition outcomes are driven by market size In our model transactions do convey information consistent with recent empirical findings Several important departures arise First adding the information dimension resolves the traditional indeterminacy of currency trade patterns by mitigating the concentrating force of market size economies Second whether transactions are executed directly or through a vehicle actually affects prices because these trading methods do not in general reveal the same information Third our model provides a new rationale for why some currency pairs never trade directly information is not sufficiently symmetric to support trading Fourth our model formalizes the arbitrage process and shows that arbitrage transaction quantities and price levels are jointly determined Empirically the paper provides a first integrated analysis of transactions in a triangle of markets Euro and Euro Data for the full triangle permits comparison of direct indirect and arbitrage transactions for each pair The information model predicts that transactions should affect prices across markets e g flow in the market should convey information relevant to Euro and Euro prices which is borne out Practical Investment Management Robert A.
