war Brilliant and ruthless Bartlett is an aristocrat and a true believer in Southern independence He has never failed The spy foresaw this decision by Richmond but he does not believe in the mission To Bartlett failure and success are both the same this time If successful he fears what enraged Northern armies will do to the South If it fails his remarkable operation in the enemys capital will be destroyed for nothing and good men along with it But whether the operation fails or succeeds the spy knows the South will suffer for it and the war made even harder on his beloved homeland Still he he is a soldier and he will follow orders Bartletts accomplices will be some of the Souths best cavalymen disguised as Union troopers They will enter Washington the night of the operation meet the spy and abduct Lincoln as he takes his nightly stroll near the Executive Mansion They will dash out of the city then down dark country roads protected by Southern partisans and into the Rebel capital The Confederate spy comes up against an unwitting opponent in Captain Peter Murphy a young Union officer from a small town in Pennsylvania Murphy has been damaged by two years of relentless warfare his sudden bursts of temper and violence have convinced his superiors to send him off to Washington for a few months of rest and recuperation Murphy is intelligent and sensitive a teacher and educator before the war but a man tormented by thoughts that he can never be the person he once was Murphy has seen combat at Antietam the Wilderness Spotsylvania Cold Harbor the Shenandoah Valley and a dozen other places He is wracked with guilt and confusion at having survived when so many others have fallen When he is ordered to Washington he must leave his friends and comrades in the Army of the Potomac a painful separation for a man already bearing many physical and mental wounds Although Philip Bartlett and Peter Murphy come from entirely different worlds and they could not possibly be more different as human beings their destinies will meet in Civil War Washington
