

APOCRINE SWEAT GLANDS

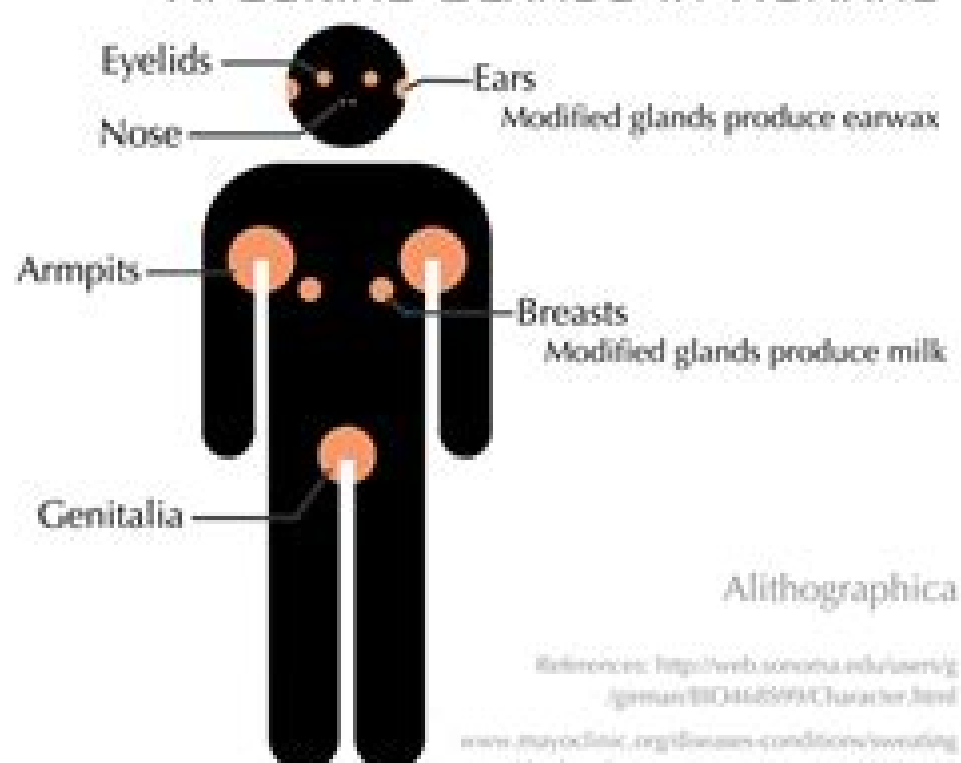

Mammals have two types of sweat glands in their skin: eccrine and apocrine. Eccrine glands secrete the watery substance we call sweat, which helps the body cool itself. Apocrine glands secrete a more opaque liquid that combines with oils from the sebaceous gland. This fluid mixture is odorless until it comes into contact with bacteria on the skin and hair. The fluid then gains the characteristic smell we associate with sweat.

Humans and primates have eccrine glands all over their bodies but apocrine glands in only a few regions. Many other mammals have widely distributed apocrine glands but limited eccrine glands. This is why it is commonly said that dogs can't sweat. Dogs do have eccrine glands but most are located on their paw pads, resulting in very limited sweating. Instead, dogs pant to regulate their body temperature.
