Investigates spinning and weaving tools from the Southern Levant and Egypt exploring their evolution regional differences and cross cultural influences from the Neolithic to the Persian period Textile tools offer a fascinating and yet intimate approach to ancient people Textile production has been one of the core activities for millennia spanning from domestic production to royal needs Textiles were light goods easy to transport and often exchanged over long distances Technology and know how however might not have always travelled so easily This work examines spinning and weaving tools from the Southern Levant inland and coastal and Egypt The chronology of the study is broad ranging from the Neolithic until the beginning of the Persian period 600 BC The objects are investigated from both a diachronic and synchronic perspective to understand their evolution and continuity of use as well as regional differences and textile production methods The two areas present an only apparent discontinuity as political boundaries gave way at various historical moments and the two areas had very close contacts such as during the Second Intermediate Period of Egypt or the Egyptian domination of the Late Bronze Age This seems to be reflected in textile documentation which shows the appearance of Egyptian tools in the Levant such as spinning bowls and Levantine tools in Egypt such as loom weights However the result is not so predictable
