Adogbo, 2010-04-01

Comparative Historical and Interpretative Study of Religions is a historical and interpretative study of religions The work provides a thorough methodological discussion on specific themes historical figures and movements in Religious Studies It delves into other themes such as the concepts of God spirits mysterious forces pollution and ritual symbolism The reference to the Urhobo is a clear demonstration of current efforts by scholars in this area of study to de emphasise the old forms of generalisation to greater differentiation This approach provides new impetus for meaningful interpretation and comprehensive examination of the various themes in the light of current scholarship Also fundamental an analysis of the methodological problems in the study of African traditional religions Some remedies which are intended to open new avenues for researchers are highlighted

Ancient African Religions Robert M. Baum, 2024 Scholars have sometimes maintained that the study of the history of African religions is an impossible endeavor Some have contended that African religions do not have a history unto themselves apart from their interaction with the newer religious traditions of Islam and Christianity Others concede that such a history exists but believe the source materials are insufficient to reconstruct such a history This book speaks directly to these critics The history of African religions becomes in many ways like a pentathlon expecting the scholar who conducts such research to work with written texts to learn African languages to live within a community where these religious traditions are practiced to study material culture both sacred and mundane and a variety of archaeological sources from tree rings to stone circles and gravesites By relying on the existing corpus of written texts oral traditions linguistic analyses descriptions based on participant observation and various types of archaeology Robert M Baum demonstrates that African religious history is nearly as old as humanity itself Baum has spent his entire academic career focused on the historical study of African religious traditions as far back as accessible sources will permit This volume traces the history of African religions beginning with early hominids and their ritual and burial sites through ancient Egypt North and Northeast Africa and Africa south of the Sahara from the Fourth Millennium BCE to the birth of Islam in the Seventh Century
