Abstract The authors examined the effects of a 10-week, 12-session, 120-min, group-based, self-help, and self-guided program on the self-efficacy and self-management skills of 100 African American women with type 2 diabetes. The program was designed to improve self-management skills and self-efficacy. The program was evaluated using a pretest-posttest design. The results showed that the program had a significant positive effect on self-efficacy and self-management skills. The program was well accepted by the participants. The authors conclude that the program is a promising intervention for improving self-management skills and self-efficacy in African American women with type 2 diabetes.

Abstract

Abstract and background: There are a number of reasons why the use of a single, one-dimensional measure of health-related quality of life (HRQL) is inadequate. The purpose of this study was to compare the use of a single measure of HRQL with the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL in a clinical trial. Methods: A clinical trial was conducted in which the use of a single measure of HRQL was compared with the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL. The results of the trial were compared with the results of a trial in which the use of a single measure of HRQL was compared with the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL. Results: The results of the trial showed that the use of a single measure of HRQL was inadequate in a clinical trial. The use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL was found to be more adequate in a clinical trial. Conclusion: The use of a single measure of HRQL is inadequate in a clinical trial. The use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL is more adequate in a clinical trial.
