

TEXT 1

The following article explores whether India's tiger conservation parks, which are a major tourist attraction, do more harm than good.

India is home to the largest remaining wild populations of the tiger. They are the poster species of the country's tourism marketing, attracting hundreds of thousands of visitors to visit the country every year. So no wonder a suggestion to ban tourists from tiger conservation zones has led to a debate over the connections between wildlife tourism and conservation.

In India the government and international wildlife organisations have devoted their time and funds to protect tigers against poachers. As a result, the total Bengal tiger population has recovered slowly during recent decades.

Increasing awareness of the animal's endangered status is important, and tiger tourism has helped to do this. It started slowly, but has grown greatly, and now the numbers of tourists visiting can cause large crowds. The animals are adversely affected by disturbance from humans and the creation of new roads and buildings to serve the tiger parks.

Yet local communities have become dependent on tourism funding, and much of it pays for work that keeps poachers at bay – tourism revenue is used to fund projects for local villagers, who act as gatekeepers against poachers. It also funds anti-poaching patrols, compensates villagers for livestock killed by tigers, and pays for fence construction. The growth of tourism parks has also helped reintroduce tigers. Simply put, if tourism money is cut abruptly, poaching will increase.

Visitors who come to see tigers bring their own problems. One concern is inappropriate driving by tour guides as they compete aggressively for tips from tourists. This leads to breaches of wildlife-watching rules, which aim to restrict vehicle speeds, animal-approach distances and crowding. It can also lead to situations where tourists are put in danger.

Fitting vehicles with GPS-units and cameras could help enforcement of the rules, but even if tigers are disturbed by tourists getting too close to take photographs, at least it is only along roads and by day.

In India, some conservationists think tigers would be better off without tourists, but the parks agency, tour operators and wildlife groups all believe a ban would cause more harm than good.
