
4. Labour market policies

Andrea Salvini and Georg Bolits

4.1 INTRODUCTION

Driven by the confluence of strong labour movements, rapid post-war economic recovery and decreased flows of international labour mobility, labour market policies (LMPs) were first conceived and implemented in Western and Northern Europe in the inter-war period (1920–38) as instruments of income replacement.¹ They were complemented by measures aimed to improve the employability of jobseekers in the 1950s and 1960s in contexts characterized by buoyant growth, such as Sweden and the United States.

In their modern form, LMPs describe the many ways in which the state influences the functioning of the labour market. Hence, they comprise the rules of the game governing the employment relation through which the state protects workers by rebalancing the disproportionate power of employers deriving from market forces. Such instruments include minimum wages policies, and provisions of the labour code granting the right to paid holidays, reasonable working hours and protections to insure workers against the most important livelihood risks: maternity, illness and accidents at work. LMPs provide instruments of protection against all forms of violence and discrimination in the world of work. Different International Labour Organization (ILO) Conventions stipulate principles and criteria to protect workers' rights, with protection in the world of work so important that many of these issues are also incorporated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Other LMPs are aimed at protecting not only workers, but also employers against systemic risks of business cycles and structural recessions: for instance, LMPs deploy efforts to protect workers and labour market participants from income losses, as well as to sustain employers in retaining their employees during difficult times or to facilitate their expansion to absorb a new workforce.²

Fiscal and other labour adjustment incentives such as employment services and active measures are also used to streamline the general functioning of the labour market, both in good and bad times, and are targeted to the employed, the unemployed as well as the many different categories of individuals composing the non-labour force.³ With different fiscal efforts and intensity, these programmes can be used to absorb demographic bulges or help the workforce adapt to technological and other changes. Labour market adjustment tools, also referred to

¹ LMPs developed with strong linkages to existing social protection institutions, notably pension systems, unemployment insurance and accident insurance, that came to exist in the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century in Germany and the United Kingdom, respectively (Jánoski 1990), as well as France and Belgium in the era of early industrialization.

² These can take the form of fiscal incentives to keep or expand the workforce.

³ Those who are not in employment and not in unemployment are statistically defined as the non-labour force. This group includes people with very diverse characteristics, from students to pensioners, discouraged and disaffected persons, as well as persons with disability and in some national classifications also the military and convicts.
