Open source design for the 3D-printed bridge is available online

BY ALEX CRONER

It's not every day that you can print a bridge. But that's what happened to a group of students at the University of Twente in the Netherlands, who have created a 3D-printed bridge that can actually be walked across. The bridge is a 3D-printed model of a suspension bridge, specifically the Golden Gate Bridge, and it's been printed in a single piece using a 3D printer. The bridge is made of a special type of plastic that is strong enough to support a person's weight, and it's been designed to be as light and compact as possible. The students used a computer program to create the 3D model of the bridge, and then they used a 3D printer to print it out. The process took several hours, but the result is a functional bridge that can be walked across. The students are hoping to use the bridge to demonstrate the power of 3D printing and to show how it can be used to create functional objects. They are also hoping to use the bridge to raise money for their university, and they are currently looking for sponsors. The bridge is currently on display at the university, and it's a popular attraction for visitors. The students are also hoping to use the bridge to raise awareness about the benefits of 3D printing, and they are encouraging others to try it out. They believe that 3D printing has the potential to revolutionize the way we create objects, and they are excited to see what the future holds for the technology.
