Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book without typos from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1913 edition. Excerpt: point of swallowing a marble or is trying to wash itself in the butter or the cat is about to take a nap on its face. Indeed the woman who has six children never knows in what direction her next step must be and the continual strain of preserving her progeny converts many a one into regular cyclones of eyes and arms and legs. It also induces in some a perpetual good humoured irritability wherein one can slap and cuddle a child in the same instant or shout threateningly or lovingly call warningly and murmur encouragingly in an astonishing sequence. The woman with six children must both physically and mentally travel at a tangent and when a husband has to be badgered or humoured into the bargain then the life of such a woman is more complex than is readily understood. When Mary came home Mrs Cafferty was sitting on her mother's bed two small children and a cat were also on the bed two slightly bigger children were under the bed and two others were galloping furiously up and down the room. At one moment these latter twain were runaway horses at another they were express trains. When they were horses they snorted and neighed and kicked when they were trains they backed and shunted blew whistles and blew off steam. The children under the bed were tigers in a jungle and they made the noises proper to such beasts and such a place they bit each other furiously and howled and growled precisely as tigers do. The pair of infants on the bed were playing the game of bump they would stand upright then spring high into the air and come crashing down on the bed which then sprung them partly up again. Each time they jumped they screamed loudly each time they fell they roared delighted congratulations to each other and when they
