

Drystone Walling

A good drystone wall may be a work of art and a joy to the eye, but its essential duty is to the farmer who needs to separate stock from sheep.

Most walls in the Cheviot Hills were built in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and have weathered well without very much maintenance. Until the 1950s gangs of local labourers were available to summer work; farmers relied on them for many of the heavy tasks such as building or digging as well as harvesting crops, when there were never enough hired hands.

Over recent years many drystone walls have fallen into disrepair and there has been no one left on the land with the skill or time to put things right. Contractors such as Tom Attey make a steady living from drystone walling, moving from farm to farm as work demands. Building a good wall is a skilled business, particularly in the Cheviots where most of the raw stone takes the form of rounded undecorated boulders rather than slabs of sandstone. It takes a ton of stones to make a yard of wall, and without 'through-stones' to bind the sections together it takes a keen touch to place the heavy boulders into the right places. Tom's walls don't fall down.

A properly built drystone wall is about 1½ yards high and tapers from the boulders at the shank to the capping stones. A rising line is set to guide the level from one end of a section to the next, and a wooden template and plumb line is placed at the end to help alignment. These or four yards of wall are built as a dry, walled cairn, or 'piled' when the job is completed, in there is pressure to work in all weather, quickly but skilfully.

Landowners in the National Park receive grants which can amount to 75% of the cost of rebuilding a wall. Over the past six years only twelve miles of crumbling walls have been dealt with in this way – a drop in the ocean considering the number built at the time of the Enclosures and the impact they still have on the landscape.

Tom Attey lives at Rothbury and has been a waller, or 'doker', for thirty years. He used sheepherding over but didn't like it, and has now flock and sheepkeeping but soon returned to the family business. The two
