Gender and Class in Modern Europe Laura L. Frader, Sonya O. Rose, 2018-07-05 Gender figured significantly in the industrial, social and political transformations of the United Kingdom and Ireland, France, Germany and Russia. This book explores its importance during a period of radical change for the working classes from 1800 through the 1930s. Collectively, the authors demonstrate how the study of gender can lead to a new understanding of working class history. The authors, leading historians, sociologists and feminist scholars, ask how gender meanings and relations shaped and were shaped by transformations in areas ranging from the Irish linen industry to German social policy, from the French labor movement to Britain's interracial settlements. With special attention to the importance of language and culture in social life, they show how political identities are constituted and social categories created, contested and changed, and how gender plays a central role in this process. Contributors: Kathleen Canning (University of Michigan), Helen Harden (Chenut Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, Paris), Anna Clark (University of North Carolina), Charlotte Judy Coffin (University of Texas at Austin), Jane Gray (St Patrick's College, Maynooth, Republic of Ireland), Tessie P. Llu (Northwestern University), Judith F. Stone (Western Michigan University), Laura Tabili (University of Arizona), Eric D. Weitz (St. Olaf College), Elizabeth A.
