Cultural Synergy in Information Institutions Richard P. Smiraglia, 2014-07-14 Cultural forces govern a synergistic relationship among information institutions that shapes their roles collectively and individually Cultural synergy is the combination of perception and behavior shaping knowledge within between and among groups Our hyperlinked era makes information sharing among institutions critically important for scholarship as well as for the advancement of humankind Information institutions are those that have or share in the mission to preserve conserve and disseminate information objects and their informative content A central idea is the notion of social epistemology that information institutions arise culturally from social forces of the cultures they inhabit and that their purpose is to disseminate that culture All information institutions are alike in critical ways Intersecting lines of cultural mission are trajectories for synergy for allowing us to perceive the universe of information institutions as interconnected and evolving and moving
