Prediction and Classification of Respiratory Motion Suk Jin Lee, Yuichi Motai, 2013-10-25 This book describes recent radiotherapy technologies including tools for measuring target position during radiotherapy and tracking based delivery systems This book presents a customized prediction of respiratory motion with clustering from multiple patient interactions The proposed method contributes to the improvement of patient treatments by considering breathing pattern for the accurate dose calculation in radiotherapy systems Real time tumor tracking where the prediction of irregularities becomes relevant has yet to be clinically established The statistical quantitative modeling for irregular breathing classification in which commercial respiration traces are retrospectively categorized into several classes based on breathing pattern are discussed as well The proposed statistical classification may provide clinical advantages to adjust the dose rate before and during the external beam radiotherapy for minimizing the safety margin In the first chapter following the Introduction to this book we review three prediction approaches of respiratory motion model based methods model free heuristic learning algorithms and hybrid methods In the following chapter we present a phantom study prediction of human motion with distributed body sensors using a Polhemus Liberty AC magnetic tracker Next we describe respiratory motion estimation with hybrid implementation of extended Kalman filter The given method assigns the recurrent neural network the role of the predictor and the extended Kalman filter the role of the corrector After that we present customized prediction of respiratory motion with clustering from multiple patient interactions For the customized prediction we construct the clustering based on breathing patterns of multiple patients using the feature selection metrics that are composed of a variety of breathing features We have evaluated the new algorithm by comparing the prediction overshoot and the tracking estimation value The experimental results of 448 patients breathing patterns validated the proposed irregular breathing classifier in the last chapter

Magnetic Straintronics Supriyo Bandyopadhyay, 2022-11-26 This book covers the new field of straintronics using strain switched nanomagnets for extremely energy efficient computing information processing communication and signal generation Based on well established CMOS technology traditional electronics have two significant shortcomings excessive energy dissipation and volatility which is the inability to retain information after power has been switched off Straintronics is more energy efficient and non volatile but also more error prone allowing it to eclipse traditional electronics in niche areas that are increasingly attracting attention such as image processing and probabilistic computing computer vision machine learning neuromorphic networks probabilistic computing and belief networks Magnetic Straintronics An Energy Efficient Hardware Paradigm for Digital and Analog Information Processing introduces straintronics and the technology's myriad applications for researchers engineers and scientists in electrical engineering physics and computer engineering
