

THE GREAT KIVA

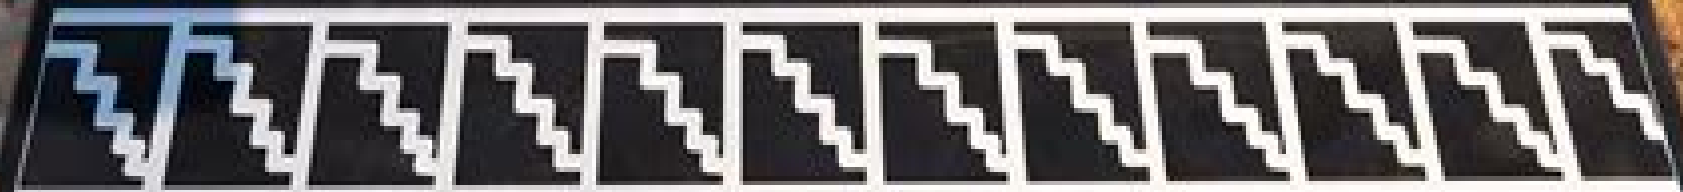

Great Kivas are special buildings that were used for community activities, including important ceremonies. Tree-ring dates and pottery indicate that this Great Kiva was a relatively early building at Lovely. It was remodeled many times and used continuously by many succeeding generations.

When the Great Kiva was excavated, I observed that it was of a more primitive type than the one at Mesa (New Mexico) or the one at Pueblo Bonito (Chaco Canyon, New Mexico). I therefore expected to find early pottery. To my surprise, I found, rather, all types of pottery from early to late. . . . This evidence seems convincing proof that the Great Kiva was the "dancing yard" which caused people to come again and again to this site.

Paul E. Martin, Lovely Ruin in Southeastern Colorado
Fort Museum of Natural History Anthropological Series
(Chicago, 1938)

Several years ago while looking at the Great Kiva in its final (and current) layout, a visitor from Santa Clara Pueblo interpreted the unique mesa features on the floor as symbols of winter people and summer people. Within these features are four platforms for pillars to support a roof. Archaeological excavations revealed remnants of a wooden post and a single mesa head within each of these platforms.
