Merriam,2001 The epyllion as a genre was developed in the Hellenistic period and continued into Roman times in order to show what else was happening while traditional heroic stories always narrated in epics with particular conventions were happening The epyllion challenges these conventions in ways that make it a genre in its own right This study examines its development through the Hellenistic and Roman periods focusing on unheroic and female characters Women in British Cinema Sue Harper,2000 Drawing on newly discovered material Sue Harper provides a survey of the ways women have been represented in British cinema from the 1930s to the present day She also analyzes the impact women have had on the industry and charts the difficulties they encountered and the successes they achieved Lively funny and often confrontational Harper criticizes many established opinions about women and the cinema This book's broad overview of film history combined with its close analysis of key films will be helpful for undergraduates General readers will be intrigued by the questions raised about the relationship between gender and creativity and Harper's fresh look at the issues of sexuality stardom and artistic constraints Film Review ,2005
