"Nice Work If You Can Get It" Jeffrey A. Hayes,2002 Many researchers recognize the dramatic changes in women s working lives during the twentieth century In this thesis I focused on changes in work outcomes within a cohort of men and women I relied primarily on the Wisconsin Longitudinal Study that started in 1957 with about ten thousand high school seniors Since that time these men and women were re interviewed in 1975 around age 36 and 1992 93 around age 54 to provide a thorough record of their family and work lives as adults I set out to answer two questions First to what extent do monetary and nonmonetary job rewards differ for men and women Jencks et al 1988 show that inequality in the distribution of nonmonetary benefits appears to increase overall inequality compared to estimates based on earnings alone Similarly I found that men are more rewarded than women at work in terms of authority as well as earnings but that the gender differences were smaller for unfavorable working conditions such as being supervised or getting dirty on the job Second do gender differences in work outcomes persist or change during midlife I found that most of the gender gaps in positive job characteristics persisted

during midlife A great deal of the gender difference in earnings and work authority can be accounted for by persistent differences between men and women in human capital Furthermore I find substantial long term effects of job characteristics over the work careers of men and women That is gender differences in the distributions of the characteristics of 1975 jobs explained some but not all of the gender differences in the distributions of job characteristics seventeen years later in 1992

Tsangarides,Huigang Chen,2009-04 Bayesian Model Averaging BMA provides a coherent mechanism to address the problem of model uncertainty In this paper we extend the BMA framework to panel data models where the lagged dependent variable as well as endogenous variables appear as regressors We propose a Limited Information Bayesian Model Averaging LIBMA methodology and then test it using simulated data Simulation results suggest that asymptotically our methodology performs well both in Bayesian model selection and averaging In particular LIBMA recovers the data generating process very well with high posterior inclusion probabilities for all the relevant regressors and parameter estimates very close to the true values These findings suggest that our methodology is well suited for inference in dynamic panel data models with short time periods in the presence of endogenous regressors under model uncertainty
