A Sociological History of Christian Worship

Cambridge University Press, 2006, viii + 268 pp.

US$ 29.99 paper (0521525594), US$ 75.00 hardcover (0521819555)

In this ambitious project, Martin Stringer attempts to chart the developmental course of Christian liturgical practices from their formative origins in the primitive Church all the way through to the contemporary period. As if a temporal expanse of nearly 2000 years of history did not pose sufficient challenges, Stringer endeavours to provide balanced regional coverage as well, offering a number of brief surveys that highlight patterns of worship prevailing in such diverse settings as the Byzantine empire, ancient Armenia, the Frankish kingdoms, Moravia, the kingdom of Rus, medieval England, Aksumite Ethiopia, South India, early modern Spain, Reformation Europe, and contemporary Tanzania. Completed within the economical compass of 240 pages of text, it follows that this book is necessarily compressed and selective in its attentiveness: an episodic rather than continuous or connected temporality underpins the ordering of its materials, and forays into the particularities of chosen locales are generally limited to broad strokes rather than detailed mappings. Even so, Stringer has read both widely and deeply in what is a dauntingly rich, dense, and overwhelming secondary literature. The information he has carefully distilled and ordered is to be welcomed not only for the insights on offer, but also for the stimulus such an arching overview will provide for future explorations.

Stringer's express purpose is to bring a more rigorous sociological approach to the study of Christian liturgical practices and worship, a field hitherto markedly informed by theological interests. Uneasy with the conventional anthropological concept of 'culture,' which he regards as too "all-encompassing" and "fundamentally static" (p. 7), and likewise troubled by the category of 'religion,' a catch-all rubric that "carries associations of continuity and coherence that make it difficult to use in a historical context," (p. 9), Stringer believes he has found in the writings of Michel Foucault a more serviceable theoretical framework. In particular, the Foucauldian category of 'discourse' becomes Stringer's master analytical key, as he utilizes this notion to reconceptualize Christian liturgical practices as forms of discourse that operate within and against shifting discursive fields and rival worldviews (such as "paganism" in the early centuries, "humanism" in the later). The extensive criticisms that Foucault's work has received, most notably the reification problems attending his structuralist conceptualization of highly restrictive discursive formations and of rupturing epistemes ("movement by a succession of immobilities," as Sartre memorably put it), and the accompanying occlusions of human agency, are not registered by Stringer. It needs noting, however, that Stringer feels compelled to widen the category of discourse — conventionally tied to speech utterances and textual communications — to include the actions, images, and settings that are co-constitutive of the praxis of worship. This broadening move would appear to go a long way back to the banished concept of 'culture,' and admirers of Geertz, Sahlins, and the Comaroffs might question the view that anthropological inquiries are incapable of linking cultures, structures, and agency in historically dynamic explanatory accounts.

Stringer's attempt to specify the "core elements" that inform Christian discourses throughout the ages actually discloses the ahistorical inflection that commonly surfaces in Foucauldian projects, which are often selective in their handling of source materials (the anomalous or striking taking precedence over the more representative or commonplace) and rather loose in securing sound periodizations. Here Stringer singles out four defining features of Christian discourses: (i) a linear
