These essential characteristics distinguish it from other common filamentous bacteria, which are often characterized by their ability to produce extracellular polymeric substances (EPS) that form a biofilm. The biofilm, which is formed by the aggregation of microorganisms, is usually composed mainly of extracellular enzymes and polysaccharides. These substances are produced by the bacterial population and form a complex network of fibers that bind the cells together. This biofilm is the primary mechanism used by these bacteria to colonize surfaces and to protect against hostile environments. The biofilm is also used to store energy, nutrients and other life-sustaining substances. It is a complex and dynamic structure that is constantly changing and adapting to its environment. The biofilm is composed of various types of bacteria, including Escherichia coli, Staphylococcus aureus, Enterococcus faecalis, and Enterococcus faecium. These bacteria are able to communicate with each other and coordinate their actions to form a cohesive and effective biofilm.
