Social Relationships And Cognitive Development:

Social Relationships and Cognitive Development Robert A. Hinde, Anne Nelly Perret-Clermont, Joan Stevenson Hinde, 1985
Most children grow up in a nuclear or extended family interacting first with one or two parents and then with siblings with relations and with friends networks which constitute the most important part of the child's environment. This volume considers the interplay between an individual's social interactions and his cognitive development tracing the effects on this interplay on children of a variety of ages and discussing the role of conflict, the neo Piagetian and Vygotskian approaches and therapies to increase social competence. The book demonstrates that cognitive development is closely related to other aspects of the individual including emotions.

Friendship has a positive impact on social and metacognitive skills and many pedagogues and authors hypothesize that having friends can affect positively children's school performance. In this book an exploratory study conducted with young pupils to investigate the impact of friendship on cognitive engagement during several search information tasks. The second chapter reviews recent research regarding the advantages of early years which focuses on enhancement and development of cognitive skills for pre-schoolers. Studies of early education identifying a positive relationship between children's participation in early education settings and social outcomes are reviewed as well. The authors of the other chapters review the impact of outdoor learning on social relationships as well as for whom the learning experience did not positively impact their social relationships, the importance of social relationships and the challenges widows face in particular older women, widows risk taking activity in particular graffiti writing to establish a status among one's peers, individual differences in the domains of reasoning and how early experiences can influence cognitive processes.
