

- Sociolinguistics is now a recognized part of linguistics' and 'language' modules in most courses at university level.
- Language is an important means of establishing and maintaining relationships.
- It provides a way for humans to subconsciously read their peers.
- Examining the way in which people use language in different social contexts can begin to explain how language works and the workings of social relationships in a community.
- The consideration of spoken communication enables a student of sociolinguistics to discover certain information about the speaker from their language, without direct questioning, this includes sex, approximate age, regional and ethnic origins, level of education and their attitude to the listener.
- Further to this, the study of language and identity, an aspect of sociolinguistics, allows the application of sociolinguistics to everyday life.
