After the treatments, the culture media contained glucose, fructose and galactose, with the total total glucose being the highest product result of all the treatments. Glucose was the major product in all the cultures, while fructose and galactose were present in smaller amounts. These concentrations are presented in Table 1. Additionally, the highest total monosaccharide concentration was obtained by the 100 mg/L glucose treatment, while the 100 mg/L fructose treatment was the lowest total concentration. These concentrations are in line with previous reports suggesting that glucose is the main product of the conversion of sucrose by S. cerevisiae (Kondo et al., 1998). The results of this study also suggest that sucrose conversion by S. cerevisiae is mainly glucose and fructose conversion, with galactose conversion being negligible. This is in line with previous reports suggesting that galactose conversion is negligible (Kondo et al., 1998).
