Popish Plot that ingenious fabrication of the infamous Titus Oates which brought a hysterical nation to the verge of panic and profoundly influenced the literature and history of Restoration England Summoned without warning on Friday November 1 1678 to the office in Whitehall of the British secretary of state the bewildered Sam was quickly removed to Winchester House where he was brought before the secret committee formed by the House of Lords to investigate the plot Interrogated by the powerful Lord Shaftesbury Sam learned that he was suspected of complicity in the murder of a Protestant magistrate Sir Edmund Bury Godfrey Actually the accusations made against Sam were intended to involve his master Mr Pepys in the Popish Plot as a part of the Protestant conspiracy to exclude the Catholic James duke of York from the succession to the throne Although Pepys was a known Protestant he had been the duke's favorite when York was the Lord High Admiral before the Test Act forced the duke as a Catholic to resign his post and there was evidence that although he deplored his former patron's religion the secretary remained loyal to him Lord Shaftesbury the archenemy of the Catholic duke hoped to use Sam Atkins's confession against Pepys and through the secretary to involve the duke of York in a conspiracy to commit murder Though a most unlikely candidate for a role in the high drama of events that ultimately served to determine the course of a great nation Sam Atkins the guileless victim brought fortitude and a not inconsiderable measure of heroism to the trials he was destined to suffer In an account of his ordeal that does full justice to Sam the human being he emerges as one of those figures rare in both history and fiction the simple man of courage who rises with dignity and grace to meet the challenge of fateful circumstances that are not of his creation and that lie totally beyond his control
