1. What is the primary purpose of the study? (e.g., to evaluate the effectiveness of a new treatment, to describe a population, to compare two groups).

Some limited improvements occurred. It was the combined influences of more strict rules, more severe discipline by officers, and more money, that were the main influences. However, these factors are not the only ones that can be used to explain the significant amount of progress that was made. The factors of strict rules, money, and more money, all contributed to the improved American management of the economy during the 1920s. The progress of the economy again was mainly determined by the actions of the government, and the money, the money supply, helped the cause. The government gave the people money, allowing business and the economy to continue to grow. The economy's main obstacle to growth was that the rich were getting more and more of the wealth, so the government had to make some changes to the economy. The government made some improvements and some changes to the economy, and the economy's performance improved. The government's actions of increasing the money supply and the money itself helped the economy to grow. The government's actions of increasing the money supply and the money itself helped the economy to grow. The government's actions of increasing the money supply and the money itself helped the economy to grow.
