Scholarly Research Paper from the year 2010 in the subject English Applied Geography grade 2

University of Education Heidelberg language English abstract

A large number of people believe that everything that is man-made can be seen as culture. Moran leaves no doubt about those products' importance when he writes: 'Products are the visible dimension of culture, are the gateway to the new culture, the new way of life' (p. 48). But are there only architecture, paintings, literature, music, language and food, which come to mind if we think of a country's culture? The iceberg model shows that these aspects represent only a small amount of culture that just like the visible section of an iceberg above the waterline can be seen easily and understood clearly. However, there are a lot more facets, also like an iceberg that can only be suspected or imagined. These parts of the iceberg are its foundation and the iceberg model makes clear that it is impossible to understand people from different cultural backgrounds unless we are able to appreciate what the foundations of their culture are. But no matter how many different definitions of the term 'culture' exist, a lot of them cover problems concerning the human beings and their life in a community. This implies that we can't learn about another country's culture by reading a lot of books about it, but we need the encounter with another way of life. In that way, culture can also be seen as a concept which regulates the interpersonal cohabitation of human beings in a collective. This collective does not have to be a country by all means, but can also be a group of people with the same interests. If some people who are fond of a special musical genre such as goth pool together, they have their own culture too, and it is not necessary that they live in the same country. But it is not merely the music that connects them, but rather shared interpretations about beliefs, values and norms which affect the behaviors.
