

PLAINS INDIANS' WAY OF LIFE: Tribal structure

Plains Indian tribes varied greatly in size which affected their structure. The largest group of Plains Indians was the Sioux – which was so big it was known as a “nation”. It consisted of three main groups – Lakota, Nekota and Dakota. These three groups were then made up of other smaller groups or bands – which were based around extended families. For example, the Lakota band included the Oglala and the Brule. The ways in which the tribes were organised meant help and support was available at every level – from family, to extended family and beyond.

FAMILY

Plains Indians lived in large family groups called bands. Members of individual families all had separate and defined roles which helped both immediate family and the band itself live successfully on the Plains. It was all about mutual support and the overall good of the tribe.

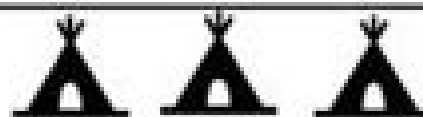

BANDS

The most basic social group was the band. Plains Indians lived in bands all year round. Members were usually closely linked through families – both immediate and extended. This helped create a sense of community, helping one another and doing things for the good of all.

GATHERINGS

In summer, Plains Indians would hold huge gatherings where all members of the tribe would camp together. These gave members an opportunity to talk about important things, as well as reinforcing family ties. The tribe also held celebrations during the gatherings and warriors would re-enact successful battles and raids.
