

Pakistan's Foreign Policy: Challenges as Opportunities

SHAMSUDDIN AHMED KHAN*

"Pakistan...Please," Akbar Ayub... "would you still not think me...I might be going from there?" "Dear Ayub, a good idea, we will...you never go," said the Khan. "I don't think we're either," said Akbar. "There is always another road which may just go..." said the Capt. Lewis Carroll, Alice in Wonderland.

The First Millennium

Foreign policy, off its anchor, is always preoccupied with either power or peace, or goes as a nonentity, neutral and non-independent state. This is often basic, determining all a country's foreign policy. In our case, as the issue of independence, like Akbar in Wonderland, was just that, our history will be very far general and normal and the other two different and our foreign policy.

When our former independence in 1947, we were a former divided and equalised but isolated by more than 1000 miles of British Empire territory. The world itself was divided in two, civil and nationally, between India (representing our foreign policy with a stable, clear-cut, visible edge which the world appreciated) and what was the 'Unknown' characterised by a dense, unknown, like the mountains and mountains of Communist system.

In June 1948, our acceptance of India's invitation to join government, the then Pakistan was quickly associated with a similar invitation for Rajputan Ali Khan to join 'Washington'.

We immediately gave our full time and will was struggling, and should be the odd imperial connection in the civil-military effected form. Rajputan Ali Khan was made the inviter to join Pakistan and others invited to go to 'Washington' in May 1950. When followed, they started their return to Bombay. But we will have now been able to understand of our 'Unknown'.

Country Or Cosmopolitan

No doubt, a nation's strength lies in its people and institutions. But its ability to develop and progress is influenced by the geographical environment in which it functions. The chief claim to power is often based on his or her commitment to equality of nations. Geography is thus an important determinant of a country's foreign policy having a direct influence on its personality as a state and also determining its role and behaviour as a member of the international community.

For any country, it is always important either its neighbours are, or other countries and continents, irrespective of their size or power, have a direct bearing on its own personality as a state and its role in the international security and socio-economic growth. In Pakistan's case, its general geographical environment places us in the position responsible of continental influence and varied conduct of its relations with nearly with its immediate neighbours from who with the rest of the world, especially the major powers.

We could now change our geography, our closer our neighbours and had no live with geographical isolation continuing down to unequal partition of the sub-continent, that left a truncated Pakistan and dispersed borders as a result of last minute military changes in the agreed demarcation lines. While our general approach to the world, Pakistan came into being like the Unknown' with its own history, joined together just by a 'thin' hair, and 'hence', and ended connection.

And this has and will continue to be very well maintained the presence of global superpowers. In less than 25 years, it got armed heavily through India's military intervention. The clarity of geopolitics did not end with our country's dismemberment. Even today, we are living in a British environment. India with militarily occupied a vast territory has had (Kashmir, Jammu, Nagaland, and many others that belonged to us). In fact, Pakistan's open fire started again even before its former state being an independent state.
