Simon Kassel, Cathleen Campbell, 1980 This report examines the impact of the Academy of Sciences on the development of technology in the Soviet Union It finds that the future of Soviet technology depends significantly on the Academy and that severe problems stemming from its nature and its relationship with Soviet industry encumber the Academy's ability to serve Soviet technology The Academy's importance derives from its unique position of national leadership in planning coordinating and performing R D and from the fact that it is expected to help solve the problems affecting Soviet industrial innovation The Academy's statutes identify it as a scientific institution dedicated to the independent pursuit of knowledge i e basic research However the Academy's effective contribution to technological development requires a substantial departure from the statutory mission of basic research in favor of more or less direct involvement with industry particularly in the successive stages of the research development and innovation RDI cycle Author Russian Technical Literature ,1960 Science
