

Meta-Analysis vs Systematic Review

Should be conducted in context of a systematic review

although not required

Quantitative

Heterogeneity is acceptable

- a meta-analysis can address the heterogeneity in the study

Does not need a meta-analysis

but can include one

Qualitative or quantitative

Studies can be heterogeneous

A Framework to Facilitate the Use of Systematic Reviews and Meta-analyses in the Design of Primary Research Studies, 2012 OBJECTIVES Systematic reviews are currently used by only a minority of researchers to inform the design of research studies This may lead to inefficient and potentially wasteful research We aimed to develop a framework which clinical researchers can apply to existing systematic reviews in order to effectively inform the design of proposed new clinical research studies DATA SOURCES Published frameworks or models designed to use results of systematic reviews or meta analyses in new research study design REVIEW METHODS A multiphase iterative process was used to develop the framework Phase 1 involved a focused literature search to identify existing frameworks and processes that have been proposed as methods to identify research gaps by systematic reviews In phase 2 we convened a multidisciplinary group with varied expertise to develop a stepwise framework In phase 3 we identified two systematic reviews and applied this framework to their results Phase 4 invited external opinions from additional experts to further refine the framework RESULTS We developed a four step framework designed to be useable by primary researchers Step 1 involves clearly laying out the crucial design elements of the proposed study using PICOTS populations interventions comparators outcomes timing and setting elements Step 2 provides a simple method to identify an existing systematic review which is current valid and relevant enough to the proposed research study to inform its design In Step 3 the details of the systematic review are examined to determine the extent to which it has already addressed the questions proposed by the new study and uses the PICOTS elements of the primary studies included in the systematic review to modify the design of the proposed study Finally Step 4 establishes the need or otherwise for the proposed study and prioritizes modifications to the research design CONCLUSIONS The four step framework proposes a practical method which can be used by clinical researchers who are not experts in systematic reviews to determine whether further research studies are needed and suggest ways that the primary literature identified by the systematic review can be used to modify the design of further research studies Further research needs to determine how useful and practical this proposed framework is for researchers and attempt to measure its value in modifying research designs and optimizing research efficiency
