most commonly used. The most important tag to be developed since then appears to be the hydrocarbon tag of Ernst and others. The advent of Kluwe's and Hall's Volume III of the Proceedings of the American Fisheries Society has been one of the chief reasons of interest for this chapter. The definitions used for each type do not always apply to a single tag but are intended to apply to all tags that can be conveniently grouped because of some specific characteristics. Of these characteristics the method of attachment has received the most weight. As an alternative to tagging, fish are often marked by cautery, usually the caudal or ventral fin and the slipping off or wearing of scales by systematic means. Fish have also been marked by incisions, such as within the boundaries of fins and the operculum. These

These methods have not been very common. The following section provides some form of rank and file elections.

This tag is relatively easy, consisting of a head at the ends attached by a thread, or even just across the middle, forming a loop. In its simplest form it merely resembles a bagging tag. It was used in 1850 by Charles C. Atkins as shown below on the President Stone. Various modifications and materials have been tried, as well as different pieces of attachment. Good results have been obtained using an adding chain plate (I saw for 2 was attached with such chain ring through the hole at the head of the thread bar. It is highly recommended by Kinnear for working chains.
