Byrne,Sarah H. Wild,2005-10-31 Text reference with chapters ranging from aetiology to pathogenesis complications and treatment addressing subjects such as the developmental origins of the metabolic syndrome oxidation inflammation and exciting new areas such as non alcoholic steatohepatitis and adipocytokines HMG-CoA Reductase Inhibitors Christine Perras,Jean Francois Baladi,Canadian Coordinating Office for Health Technology Assessment,1997 The present study is a review of published clinical trials and pharmacoeconomic evaluations of lipid lowering agents focusing mainly on HMG CoA reductase inhibitors Initiating lipid lowering drug therapy depends on a patient's lipid cholesterol LDL and HDL and overall risk profiles The choice of a particular agent depends on treatment goals the patient's concurrent medical condition and medication as well as the patient's preference and anticipated compliance with drug All statins effectively lower cholesterol and LDL levels and raise HDL levels Their safety profile is comparable Differences exist in terms of pharmacokinetic properties and drug interactions which may be important in specific patients Finally not all strains have been studied to determine their long term impact on coronary events and mortality Cost effectiveness of lipid lowering will vary among patient groups according to their risk profile and cholesterol level Accordingly secondary prevention and the treatment of high risk individuals will have a more favorable cost effectiveness ratio than treatment of other groups of individuals There is no evidence to indicate that one statin is more cost effective than another Further work is needed to determine 1 the benefits of statins in all population subgroups such as women and patients over 70 years of age 2 how statins compare in head to head trials and 3 whether they confer similar clinical benefits
