Nevaer,Steven Deck,1990-12-30 In a timely and important contribution to the management literature Louis Nevaer and Steven Deck take a careful critical look at the various forms of corporate restructurings prevalent today alliances mergers and acquisitions and at their long term implications for the structure of corporate America Taking issue with those who see the takeover frenzy as revitalizing American industry the authors argue that instead the takeover business is weakening

American industry and accelerating America's decline in the global economy. They analyze the opportunity costs being incurred by both individual firms and the entire nation through the wave of takeover activity in the 1980s demonstrating that the large debts taken on by corporate America to either finance or fend off takeovers has hampered America's ability to compete effectively in world markets. The authors then identify the essential criteria for a truly successful alliance merger or acquisition and suggest models for such restructurings in the future. Divided into five principal sections the volume begins by examining the failure of current alliance merger and acquisition strategies. The authors discuss the economic effects of restructurings on stakeholders and employees and look at the post acquisition financial performance of the new corporate entities. The next three sections present in depth analyses of alliances mergers and acquisitions. For each type of restructuring the authors identify and assess the management strategies commonly pursued and offer extended case study examples of failed and successful strategies. In the final section the authors point the way toward more effective strategic alliances. They explore selection strategies that can help ensure a successful alliance discuss the critical area of market planning and offer a model for the future based upon the real world alliance between Vulcan Materials and Calizas Industriales del Carmen. Investment bankers corporate executives and mergers and acquisitions specialists will find this a balanced and constructive critique of the process of corporate restructuring that is today such an integral feature of the contemporary business scene.

Frontiers of Strategic Alliance Research Farok J. Contractor, Jeffrey J.

Reuer,2019 The objective of this chapter and this book is to highlight areas where further research on corporate alliances is needed Scholarly interest in alliances agreements between two or more independent organizations working together under an incomplete contract in order to achieve some mutual benefit have burgeoned in the last few decades These partnerships have been studied in many different disciplines in the social sciences in addition to many functional specialties within business schools including marketing and to some extent in corporate finance Within management interest in alliances and the contributions to understanding their rise and implications for firms was first initiated in a significant way in international business studies Early interest in this research stemmed from the cross border character of the many collaborative agreements between multinational firms seeking market opportunities in emerging countries many of which then had governmental policies suggesting or mandating a local partner Today of course with the abandonment of socialist policies and the sea change in attitudes towards business in emerging nations few such restrictions remain Contractor 2013 Alliances are today for the most part voluntary collaborations between two or more companies in advanced economies driven by intrinsic strategy motivations The few government mandates that remain in emerging countries are slowly disappearing In the field of strategic management interest in alliances remains substantial continues at a rapid clip and is far from a mature field of research Many fundamentally important research questions remain unanswered however and it is the objective of this volume to indicate where further investigation may be fruitfully undertaken
