Abstract—In Machine Learning, the emergence of the right to be forgotten gave birth to a paradigm named machine unlearning, which enables data holders to proactively erase their data from a trained model. Existing machine unlearning techniques focus on centralized training, where access to all holders’ training data is a must for the server to conduct the unlearning process. It remains largely underexplored about how to achieve unlearning when full access to all training data becomes unavailable. One noteworthy example is Federated Learning (FL), where each participating data holder trains locally, without sharing their training data to the central server. In this paper, we investigate the problem of machine unlearning in FL systems. We start with a formal definition of the unlearning problem in FL and propose a rapid retraining approach to fully erase data samples from a trained FL model. The resulting design allows data holders to jointly conduct the unlearning process efficiently while keeping their training data locally. Our formal convergence and complexity analysis demonstrate that our design can preserve model utility with high efficiency. Extensive evaluations on four real-world datasets illustrate the effectiveness and performance of our proposed realization.

I. INTRODUCTION

The paradigm of “Machine Unlearning” [1] has attracted much attention recently. It has emerged from “the right to be forgotten” [2], where individuals should be entitled to the right to have their private data removed from public directories. This regulated requirement has also set off a privacy-aware technology reform in the context of Machine Learning. From a high-level point of view, the techniques of machine unlearning enable data holders to proactively erase their data from a trained model that memorizes the data. Most of the existing machine unlearning techniques focus on the centralized setting [3]–[10], where all the training data samples are collected to a server, and later specific samples are requested to be erased via unlearning. However, this setting can be somewhat limited in practice because not all data holders are willing to share data for training due to increasing privacy concerns.

In this paper, we investigate the problem of machine unlearning in a more practical scenario, where data holders are collaboratively performing training and unlearning without sharing raw data. In particular, we target Federated Learning (FL) [11]–[17], a widely adopted privacy-aware collaborative learning framework. In FL, data holders train a model from their local data samples, and the server only aggregates data holders’ local model updates for data privacy considerations [18]. Despite the above benefit, not allowing the sharing of raw data also poses unique challenges for unlearning in FL.

To erase data samples from a trained FL model, a straightforward approach is to simply train a new model from scratch on the remaining dataset (i.e., excluding the samples that need to be erased) following the original training procedure of FL. However, this approach would be neither practical nor economical for real-world models that are usually trained for weeks from massive training samples. Existing studies on centralized machine unlearning [5]–[8] are not directly applicable because they have to access the raw data during unlearning, which is prohibitive in FL in the first place. Very recently, Liu et al. [19] proposed an approach called FedEraser that aims to address this problem in FL. Unfortunately, this approach has two drawbacks. First, FedEraser only initiates the unlearning algorithm among the clients that request data removal. Namely, other clients’ models still hold the contributions of the data to be removed, which will later be aggregated in a global model. Second, their proposed algorithm utilizes the latest rounds of local model updates to approximate the current unlearned model update. However, the data samples to be removed can be used for training from the very beginning, and the utilized model updates may still consist of the trace of those samples.

Erasing data samples from a trained FL model is non-trivial. To better understand the problem, we first identify two unique challenges in the context of FL as follows.

(C1.) Training is interactive. In FL, the client holds data locally and iteratively exchanges model updates with the server to learn a shared global model. In this context, it is challenging for the central server to erase the contribution of the client data to the model. The key reason is that the client continuously shares the knowledge learned from the local dataset with other clients via model aggregation.

(C2.) Training is incremental. Training in FL is also an incremental procedure in which any given local update reflects all previous updates that occurred on the client. Suppose the global model is updated based on the local model updates that specific clients generate at a particular training round. In that case, all subsequent model updates will implicitly relate to the model updates of these clients.

The Lost Art of Reading Gerald Stanley Lee, 2022-08-01 Gerald Stanley Lee's The Lost Art of Reading is not merely a title; it is a profound exploration of the shifting landscape of human engagement with text, thought, and knowledge. Lee delves into the intimacies of our relationship with books, extrapolating on the effects of their possible decline in an age predawn of electronic media. His literary style is an eloquent synergy of the philosophical treatise and poetic reflection, enabling a discourse rich in allegory and imagery capturing the essence of a time when literature was on the brink of transformation. Within its historical context, the book emerges as a compelling foresight grappling with predictions and insights that resonate to this day in our multimedia-saturated world. In understanding the author, Gerald Stanley Lee, one must recognize that he was a visionary, a thinker exceptionally ahead of his time. His contemplations on the evolution of reading and its societal implications sprout from his own prolific background as an editor, lecturer, and writer during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. His works are stamped with his deep-seated belief in the power of the written word and the intellectual emancipation it grants. The Lost Art of Reading reflects Lee's response to the seismic shifts he observed within the culture of literature ushered in by technological advancement and changing social paradigms. This exceptional, republished work is highly recommended to those who seek to understand the metamorphosis of literacy, its historical transitions, and their consequences on contemporary society. Binding the keen intellect of the past with the dynamic pace of modern discourse, it offers insightful commentary to educators, scholars, and bibliophiles. With DigiCat Publishing's careful curation, the message and nuance of Lee's perspectives are preserved, inviting readers to rediscover the invaluable art of reading and to consider its fate with both nostalgia and foresight.
