been unmindful of his promise to look after my brother and had secured him an excellent first floor sitting room with a bedroom adjoining having an aspect towards New College Lane I shall pass over the first two years of my brother's residence at Oxford because they have nothing to do with the present story They were spent no doubt in the ordinary routine of work and recreation common in Oxford at that period From his earliest boyhood he had been passionately devoted to music and had attained a considerable proficiency on the violin In the autumn term of 1841 he made the acquaintance of Mr William Gaskell a very talented student at New College and also a more than tolerable musician The practice of music was then very much less common at Oxford than it has since become and there were none of those societies existing which now do so much to promote its study among undergraduates It was therefore a cause of much gratification to the two young men and it afterwards became a strong bond of friendship to discover that one was as devoted to the pianoforte as was the other to the violin Mr Gaskell though in easy circumstances had not a pianoforte in his rooms and was pleased to use a fine instrument by D'Almaine that John had that term received as a birthday present from his guardian
