

AFTER-DINNER SPEECHES AND HOW TO MAKE THEM

The true flower of a life is the spirit of hospitality and good fellowship. There is a declaration in Ecclesiastes that "gladness of heart is the life of man and the perfection of a man's good-fortune lies here." This lightness of spirit is not only an attribute of untroubledness but untroubledness is not, but is often times turned to practical business advantage. In the business of nations, especially, where the best advantage of several nations are with us all personally and independently as nations, the representatives of different powers may make much in many ways in those periods, when in spirit, the greatest hospitality and good will there are all other forms of progress put together. To illustrate, King George has announced to London right there, that he will donate a loan to relief, give him his money, and allow him thirty-five thousand dollars a year for maintenance and the operation and growth of society. The King's declaration to France is given a total of fifty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, besides the money, some of which is used for social betterment. In summary, then, a certain amount of good fellowship has always been regarded as promoting commercial objects. Perhaps someone, some time, will write on hospitality as an economic factor. William Brewster has written the subject in his Physiology of Taste. The highest and most complimentary expression of this hospitality and good fellowship is found, it is generally agreed, in an invitation to dine and to enjoy the good cheer, of whatever kind, that accompanies a dinner. In a place and every student classifying through the Ages, Mr. John W. Mahaffy, of Trinity College, Dublin, traces briefly the beginnings of hospitality. He says, "Hospice, in a well-known passage of the Old Testament, makes the first starting point of
