Entrepreneurship and the City Edward L. Glaeser,2007 Why do levels of entrepreneurship differ across America's cities This paper presents basic facts on two measures of entrepreneurship the self employment rate and the number of small firms Both of these measures are correlated with urban success suggesting that more entrepreneurial cities are more successful There is considerable variation in the self employment rate across metropolitan areas but about one half of this heterogeneity can be explained by demographic and industrial variation Self employment is particularly associated with abundant older citizens and with the presence of input suppliers Conversely small firm size and employment growth due to unaffiliated new establishments is associated most strongly with the presence of input suppliers and an appropriate labor force I also find support for the Chinitz 1961 hypothesis that entrepreneurship is linked to a large number of small firms in supplying industries Finally there is a strong connection between area level education and entrepreneurship      Membership Directory American Institute of Professional Geologists,2004      Geograficheskii zhurnal ,2005      The Ultimate Job
