The authors all noted authorities in the fields of economics, diplomacy, energy and defense consider an unprecedented range of influences and factors to avoid the limitations of looking at the subject myopically or with political bias. They conclude that while energy insecurity could eventually lead to an arms race at sea or even a naval conflict that neither side wants, there is ample room for Sino-American energy dialogue and cooperation in the maritime domain.

Contemporary Southeast Asia, 2008 Framing Security Agendas Rosemary Foot, 2008 What has it meant to be labeled the second front in the global war on terror? Have Southeast Asian states accepted that the primary threat their countries face is Al Qaeda inspired terrorist violence or are other security concerns deemed more pressing? This study investigates threat perceptions in four Southeast Asian countries: Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines and Singapore. It probes the extent to which their security concerns align with those of Washington, together with their preferred means for dealing with the phenomenon of terrorist violence. The central findings are that in all four countries the U.S. counterterrorist security agenda has shaped security perceptions as well as security behavior, though to a greater extent in the Philippines and Singapore than in Indonesia and Malaysia. However, the most important effect in Southeast Asia of this change in the U.S. security priority after 9/11 has been sociopolitical in nature, even where an individual government might not perceive the threat from terrorism to be the major security challenge that it faces. In each of the four states, involvement in the U.S. decision to give overwhelming attention to counterterrorist action has sharpened the focus on long standing security concerns, especially those connected with the security of the political regime or unity of society. In sum, these countries' domestic concerns interact in complex and subtle ways with their security relationship with the United States as well as affecting the methods that the individual governments have used to deal with actual or potential terrorist violence inside their countries European Journal of East Asian Studies ,2008 Reluctant Restraint Evan S. Medeiros,2007 This book examines how and why China has moved over the last twenty years from opposing nonproliferation of missiles and nuclear weapons to support proliferation
