The origin of horse racing cannot be fixed by any quotation of dates as none are extant to show by whom the first race was planned the terms on which it was run the distance traversed the kind of horses which ran the men who trained them or the jockeys who rode them It may however be taken for granted that as an English sport horse racing began in homely fashion and in the days of old centuries ago that is to say was a very different pastime from what it is to day Attempts have often been made to trace the beginnings of horse racing but not with much success It has been assumed by writers on the subject that there would in the first place be trials of strength of a friendly description among neighbours matches perhaps between horses which their owners looked upon as being animals above the common run Scientific or planned racing in other words the elaborately arranged contests with which as a nation we are familiar is it may be said a comparatively modern pastime But the sport of horse racing as we know it to day has undoubtedly been elaborated from those simple trials of equine strength that took place centuries ago which may in many instances have been arranged to promote the selling of horses Look ye sir let us try our horses against each other and if yours prove better than mine I'll buy it is a saying that might represent the idea entertained and so on an improvised course ridden very likely by their owners owners up at what are called catch weights there would off hand be run a race of the kind indicated At village feasts fairs and other gatherings of a popular kind as has been often told races of a rough and ready sort precursors of the more elaborate meetings with which the public are now familiar were long ago run
