 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Content area, previously referred to as subject or subject area, can be described as a specified domain of skill and knowledge in any academic program. In public schools, the content areas are typically divided into English language arts (or simply English), social studies (which include history and civics), technical subjects, and science. Sometimes, these traditional content areas may combine or intersect due to certain commonalities or shared topics. For example, humanities represent English language arts and social studies; fine and performing arts include theater, dance, music, and visual art; science, technology, engineering, and math form an acronym STEM. The content area approach generally allows schools to adequately organize information, teaching process, and overall academic programming. Consequently, learning standards, generalized tests, faculty departments, academic teams, and requirements for graduation, as well as the reading, are all subjected to organization according to content areas.

In this context, content area reading is a specific approach to reading that a student has to implement to understand and complete a particular area of a subject properly. The reading associated with a specific content area includes the ideas and concepts necessary for these subjects; its text is also structured according to the rules of the field practitioners. In other words, the vast majority of the texts that can be found in these subjects are informational (expository). That is why they require different strategies for efficient reading and comprehension. There are many valuable tips, approaches, and techniques that increase the students' level of content area understanding. Organizing and standardizing is the primary purpose of the Common Core State Standards Initiative effort (CCSSI); therefore, it was also applied to the content area reading.

Understanding the importance of reading in the learning process, CCSSI has successfully generalized strategies that can help students in their reading exercises. First of all, according to Appendix A, to improve content-area reading among students, teachers should adequately organize the texts using the three-part model for measuring text complexity before presenting them to students (CCSSI). It implies the qualitative and quantitative text analysis, as well as reader and task considerations (CCSSI). The
