

sion. Not enough alternative peasant strategies are presented to substitute for those being criticized. In addition, most any policy positions are presented without sufficient supporting data or concrete examples. More quantitative data are needed regarding trends in agricultural practices, comparative income streams from traditional and "improved" cropping systems, holding times, or the relationship between tenure policies and future in-migration to forest lands. Fewer many villages, for example, have successfully incorporated new technologies into traditional systems? Lastly, little or no has been made of comparative research on the situation in highland areas outside of Thailand. The article on re-institution was representative of the situation in hill Nepal, but there was no reference to the extensive literature regarding that situation.

The Human Ecology of Tropical Land Settlement in Latin America. David A. Schlesinger and Matthew L. Partridge, eds. Westview Special Studies on Latin America and the Caribbean. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990. 467 pp. $26.50 (paper).

*David A. Schlesinger
University of Pennsylvania*

"The 'human ecology' at the title of this work is broadly defined, encompassing not only human culture and biological adaptation to the physical environment (which actually receives very little detailed coverage), but also adaptation to the interrelated facets of the local, regional, national, and international political economy (which constitutes the volume's main analytical framework). As Schlesinger notes in his foreword, 'it is in the analysis of the political economy of land settlement where they [the authors] make their most original and important contribution' (p. x).

The volume contains fourteen papers (only one of which is a reprint) arranged under "Introduction" (two papers); "Central America" (two); "South America" (six); and "Argentina" (one). The authors of the synopses—occasionally resemble one or two settlement generalities or a colonization case within a specific country—the exception being Jolby, who summarizes the colonization process in most of Central America and provides a number of brief country-oriented examples. If the papers are their respective by their focus on small-scale, pioneering, bartering settlements and the analysis of the factors contributing to the failure or success of these enterprises.

As revealed in the articles, the factors that influence small-scale pioneer farming are numerous, complex, and vary considerably from case to case. The introductory chapters (by Partridge and Mican respectively) provide an excellent overview and guide for placing the cases within the overall colonization framework, and the epilogue (by Ledee and Gundlach) serves admirably to relate the cases within a natural environmental context.

All of the articles shed light on constraints to success, including, but not limited to, lack of necessary offland resources; absence of adequate infrastructure; lack of familiarity with local environments and appropriate agricultural knowledge; absence of feasibility studies and climate-related data; lack of initial capital; alienation of social organization; and lack of educational and health services. In general, the articles reinforce the proposition that failure for the failure of development, and colonization schemes usually does not benefit the small scale farmers. Rather, the actions of these farmers are revealed to be reasonable adaptations to the larger system of political, economic, social, and environmental limitations and possibilities in which they find themselves embedded at any particular time. For example, the oft-cited idea that settlers frequently adopt ill-suited agricultural practices because they lack knowledge about the local natural environment and expertise in suitable and sustainable agricultural techniques is convincingly questioned. Both Jolby and Capillari show that even indigenous groups (who possess this knowledge and expertise) in the colonization zones are drawn into new, inappropriate production schemes by the forces of national policy, international interests, and economic opportunities.

Overall, the settlement schemes dealt with in the volume are organized as unsuccessful (either in the short or long term), whether viewed from a broad socioeconomic or an ecological perspective. Specific suggestions for viable solutions are, however, generally lacking in the individual chapters, with the exceptions of Jolby (who describes an alternative that is currently being tested in Paraguay) and Ledee and Gundlach (who delineate some environmentally sound guidelines).

This volume, emphasizing as it does the analysis of the political economy of tropical land settlement by small-scale farmers, complements and augments previous work on the subject. It is a valuable reading for those interested in the subject and would help to enlarge those interested in any form of empirical research of ecological and conservation in Latin America.
