

UNDERSTANDING INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS: ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF CONTRIBUTIONS BY AGRICULTURAL ECONOMISTS

Tim Josling, Kym Anderson, Andrew Schmitz, and Stefan Tangermann

The study of international trade in agricultural products has developed rapidly over the past fifty years. In the 1960s the disarray in world agriculture caused by domestic price support policies became the focus of analytical studies. There followed attempts to measure the distortions caused by policies also in developing countries and to model their impact on world agricultural markets. Tools were advanced to explain the trends and variations in world prices and the implications of market imperfections. Challenges for the future include analyzing trade based on consumer preferences for certain production methods and understanding the impact of climate change mitigation and adaptation on trade.

Key words: agricultural trade; commodity prices; trade policy; agricultural trade distortions; measurement of agricultural protection; modeling agricultural trade.

JEL Codes: F13, F55, Q17.

The study of the economics of international trade in agricultural and food products is a relatively new area of specialization in the agricultural economics profession. Certainly the three mainstream areas that dominated the first fifty years of the American Agricultural Economics Association (AAEA)—production economics, marketing, and policy—each acknowledged the existence of international trade, but they largely ignored the analytical challenge of understanding the behavior of international markets and their role in resource-use efficiency and income distribution. By contrast, most agricultural economists trained since the 1960s have been exposed to international trade theory and recognize the pervasive influence of international economic events on domestic markets and policies. Trade agreements have evolved to where they constrain domestic policy, and international commodity prices are usually transmitted at least to some extent back to the farm level. Even the “newer” areas of agricultural and applied economics, such as environmental and resource economics, development economics, and consumer economics, are influenced by the institutions of international trade.

This review aims to document the growth of the study of international agricultural markets and institutions by identifying some of the main contributions of the profession to our understanding of the key issues. It is a subjective assessment of the development of professional thinking on several of the main areas where contributions have been made to the understanding of the nature of international trade in agriculture and food commodities. Each of these advances illustrates the cumulative contributions made by economists working in universities and research agencies of national and international institutions. We apologize at the outset to the many whose work we have not been able to mention.
