Warnock, 2006 Despite the disappearance of formal barriers to international investment across countries we find that the average home bias of US investors towards the 46 countries with the largest equity markets did not fall from 1994 to 2004 when countries are equally weighted but fell when countries are weighted by market capitalisation This evidence is inconsistent with portfolio theory explanations of the home bias but is consistent with what we call the optimal insider ownership theory of the home bias Since foreign investors can only own shares not held by insiders there will be a large home bias towards countries in which insiders own large stakes in corporations Consequently for the home bias to fall substantially insider ownership has to fall in countries where it is high Poor governance leads to concentrated insider ownership so that governance improvements make it possible for corporate ownership to become more dispersed and for the home bias to fall We find that the home bias of US investors decreased the most towards countries in which the ownership by corporate insiders is low and countries in which ownership by corporate insiders fell Using firm level data for Korea we find that portfolio equity investment by foreign investors in Korean firms is inversely related to insider ownership and that the firms that attract the most foreign portfolio equity investment are large firms with dispersed ownership     Grassroots Economic Organizing Newsletter , 2004     Library Journal , 2005
