

The Merchant's Prologue and Tale

The Merchant in the General Prologue

"forked berd" - fashionable

"bootes clasped faire and fetisly" - neat and elegant fastening, the Merchant takes care to appear as if he has a high status

"worthy" - this is how the Merchant will soon describe Januarie, who is clearly not at all "worthy", casting doubts on the Merchant's own worthiness

"in dette" secretive and perhaps untrustworthy, his wealth and status is not as respectable as it seems, the narrator also does not know the Merchant's name

The Merchant's Prologue

The Merchant is responding to the Clerk's story about the perfect woman, Griselda

The Merchant says his wife has caused him "weping and wailing", she is a "shrewe"

- Compares his wife to a rodent, a common animalisation of women in literature
- Mean-spirited and inferior
- Shakespeare's "The Taming of the Shrew"
- The Merchant says that even if his wife were married to the devil she would be able to overpower him
- The revelation that they have only been married for "thise monthes two" invalidates the Merchant's knowledge and opinions on the subject, comes across as foolish
- The Host establishes that the aim of the Merchant's story will be to justify his unhappiness by blaming womankind's deceitful nature, and to lament the foolishly trusting nature of men

The Fabliau style was popularised in medieval France
