Book News, 1892      Henry James Roslyn Jolly, 1993 This is a study of Henry James's changing attitudes to history as a narrative model tracing the development from his early interest in scientific historiography to the radically antihistorical character of his late works James's use of the term history was influenced by developments in nineteenth century historiography but was also embedded in the complex of defensive manoeuvres through which Victorian culture sought to control its anxiety about the power of fiction Reading James's novels in the light of nineteenth century debates about the morality of authorship and the politics of reading Dr Jolla finds that fiction moves from being history's censored other in the early works to being a valued mode of problem solving in the later fiction This shift may be seen as the product of James's increasing engagement with the reading practices of groups marginalized by high Victorian culture women the working class other cultures and the avant garde Drawing on contemporary narrative theory and providing illuminating readings of a large number of James's novels Roslyn Jolly has written a sophisticated and persuasive analysis of James's shifting definitions of history and fiction      Literary News, 1891      The Literary News Frederick Leypoldt, 1891      Forthcoming Books Rose Army, 2003
