

What is Grounding?

When we have experienced difficult events in our lives, we often find ourselves being transported from the present moment to be fully encapsulated by thoughts, images, emotions, sensations, and feelings either associated with the past or the future.

This can happen by a trigger, internally or externally, in our environment, which, consciously or subconsciously, reminds us of something painful that we haven't fully processed yet.

Yes - we can be triggered by something and be completely unaware of the reasons why or even what the initial trigger was in the first place.

One way to start becoming more familiar with our triggers is to keep a journal or notes each time you notice that you have a strong physical, mental, or emotional reaction in your life, and assess any connections to what could have "triggered" it.

Typically, during these triggering events, our minds and bodies are going into fight/flight/ fleeze/appease mode. This mode is controlled by the limbic portion of our brains. When we are triggered, the limbic system takes over the driver's seat, and our prefrontal cortex, which is in charge of our ability to rationalize/reason, ends up going offline.

It can be difficult to regulate the nervous system once it has gone full steam from a 0 to 10. This is why it is so important to become familiar with your triggers and physical/mental/emotional sensations so that you can become an expert at noticing the first, slightest tinges of them, and then, in turn, incorporate one of your intervention tools to help regulate your nervous system.

Grounding is one tool that helps to remind your body and mind that it is currently present and not in a subconscious past or even memory.

Grounding helps to bring you consciously to the present moment through awareness of your current environment by noticing your physical relationship with your surroundings.
