Because of the importance of the first impression and the nature of the subject, the most common strategy seems to be the avoidance of the question. This approach is not unusual, but it is a strategy that can easily lead to a misconception about the underlying thought or feeling of the questioner. In this case, the questioner is asking for a general assessment of the group's potential for productivity, and the answerer is responding by making a specific and often rather negative assessment. This is a common mistake, and it is one that can easily lead to a misconception about the questioner's true intent.
