The potentials and barriers when introducing renewable energy technologies RETs in DCs are presented by using selected project examples. The discussion emphasizes that not only economical institutional and infrastructural factors contribute to the low dissemination rates of RETs in DCs but also the social acceptance by potential users. Finally the results from this investigation are used to discuss the current and future household energy provision in Kenya. The second part of the study elaborates on the possibility of sustainably introducing the oil tree Jatropha curcas L as a bioenergy source.
