These research interests have led to the development of a number of new methods for the analysis of the structure of the genome. These include the use of molecular probes to identify specific DNA sequences, the use of recombinant DNA technology to clone and express specific genes, and the use of computer analysis to identify patterns of gene expression. These methods have been used to study the structure and function of the human genome, and have led to the discovery of many new genes and their functions. This research has also led to the development of new medical treatments for genetic disorders, such as cystic fibrosis and sickle cell anemia. The use of recombinant DNA technology has also led to the development of new diagnostic tests for genetic disorders, such as the use of polymerase chain reaction (PCR) to detect specific DNA sequences. This research has also led to the development of new methods for the analysis of the genome, such as the use of microarray technology to study gene expression patterns.
